Kentucky school district: Students are dressing and acting like cats

The Meade County School district is dealing with an unusual situation: a group of high school students is attending school acting like and dressing as cats.

The superintendent tells WLKY the situation is being addressed, but according to a concerned grandparent, it's an ongoing problem that has many students on edge.

"Apparently, from what I understand, they're called 'furrries,'" the grandmother, who asked to remain anonymous, told WLKY. "They identify with animals. These people will hiss at you or scratch at you if they don't like something you're doing."

She said it's not a new problem.

"I was hearing rumblings of this last year, but it really got bad when they went back to school this year. I have two grandkids in school and my grandkids didn't want to go to school anymore," she said.

She said the issue gained attention on social media once people started sharing photos and videos of the feline costumes and behavior, "I started getting videos and messages from kids, and I said, 'Ok, I'm going to post this so parents know what's going on.'"

The grandmother said a petition to end the practice was created by students and has more than 1,000 signatures.

"The students are told they can't wear hats or Budweiser shirts in school, but they can wear cat ears, cat tails, masks, leashes. It doesn't make sense," she added.

But according to Superintendent Mark Martin, a petition isn't needed.

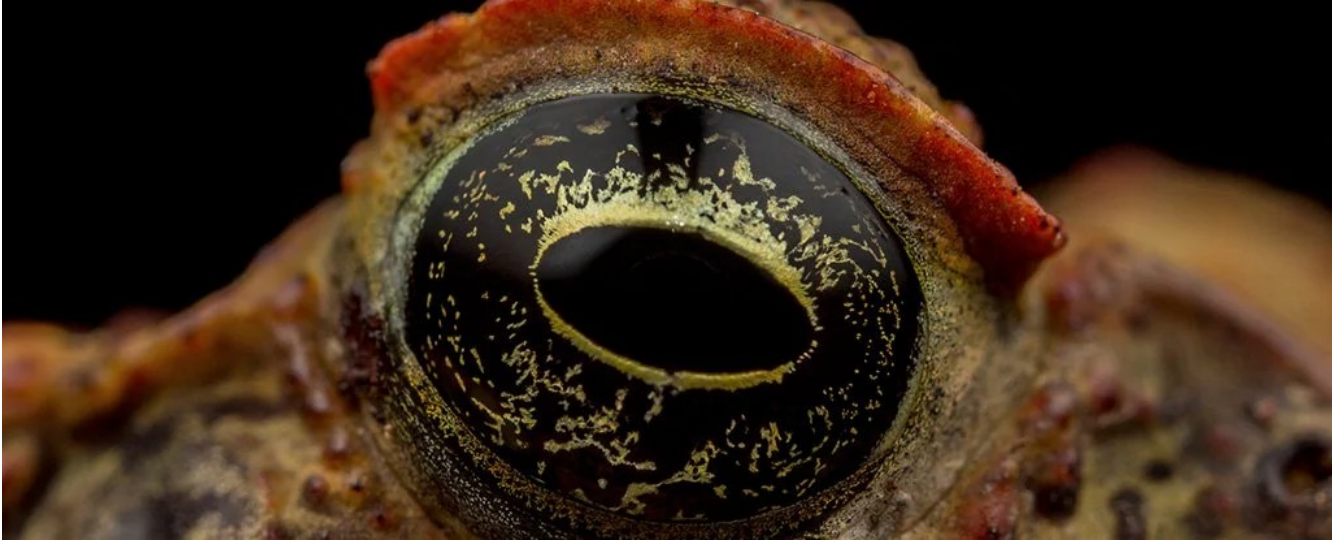

He said the costumes violate the school dress code:

"A small number of Meade County High School students have violated the dress code policy during the early part of the school year. These situations have been addressed consistently by administration and the dress code policy will continue to be implemented with fidelity. Meade County Schools will not discuss individual student discipline due to privacy laws."

The grandmother is urging parents and family members to attend the Meade County School Board meeting on Sept. 14 to request further action.

"This is still a problem. We have excellent schools here. I'm just embarrassed by what this has gotten to," she said.

Australia's Invasive Cane Toads Are Turning Into Increasingly Ruthless Cannibals

Since their introduction to Australia in 1935, cane toads (Rhinella marina) have been rapidly devouring their way across the northern part of the continent. Their feasting bonanza, unchecked by predators or parasites evolved to deal with their toxicity, has seen their numbers explode.

There are now so many cane toads, natural selection has favored more cannibalistic tadpoles, a new experimental study has just revealed.

Initially introduced to Australia in an attempt to control local cane beetles (Dermolepida albobirtum) to protect sugar cane industry in the country's northern state of Queensland, the original 102 individual toads now count somewhere in the 200 millions, with densities around 10 times those in their native South American habitats.

Cane toads are toxic as both adults and tadpoles, which has caused massive problems for Australian predators like the adorable northern quolls (Dasyurus hallucatus). Now rare, these marsupial predators have almost wiped themselves out trying to eat the toads and succumbing to their toxins.

Cane toad tadpoles usually graze on algae and decomposing organic matter. While they're known to be occasionally cannibalistic in their native lands and have been caught munching on each other even as adults, researchers had a hunch that the intense boom of cane toad numbers in Australia might have boosted their cannibalistic tendencies.

Defiant Texas school OKs opposite sex spankings after principal breaks rule

Unrepentant school district changes rules to allow male staff members to use corporal punishment on school girls as long as a female member of staff is present

In defiance of the national outrage over the paddling of two high school girls by a male vice principal, a Texas school district voted last night to allow corporal punishment by members of the opposite sex.

Rather than apologising for the actions of the male teacher who spanked two high school girls, the board members of Springtown Independent School District voted to change their policy, which now requires a female member of staff to be present if a male school official physically disciplines a girl.

The vote followed a heated debate over the district's policy which began after Taylor Santos, 15 and Jada Watts, 16, were both struck with a paddle on their buttocks by assistant principal Kirt Shaw for disciplinary reasons.
